Twice-baked challah for the break-fast table

A make-ahead French-toast-style bake uses stale challah, maple-orange syrup, and an almond topping.

Noah and Rae Bernamoff’s Mile End recipe dunks day-old challah slices in a maple-orange syrup, spreads on almond-paste topping with dried cherries, and bakes about 20 to 25 minutes. The syrup and topping can be made ahead and held in the fridge, then assembled before serving. A Toronto kosher caterer has pointed to the same dish as an easy break-fast option after Yom Kippur.

Fall 2026 accessories that do the talking

Vogue’s September accessory roundup puts scarves, brooches, and stoles ahead of a full wardrobe reset.

Silk scarves, floral brooches, fringe stoles, and charm jewelry kept showing up as the easiest outfit change.

The practical move for a busy week is one intentional accent—scarf, brooch, or stole—rather than chasing every runway look.

DEAR TIMES

Can the challah loaf wait until after candles?

Dear Times, RHA flagged challah today and candle lighting is at 7:04. I still have Friday cleanup and a loaf that should cool before we cut it. If the candles are ready on time, is it acceptable to slice the bread after we light, or does the loaf need to be on the table first?

– Cooling Rack, Toronto

Dear Cooling Rack, Light on time. The loaf can finish cooling while you light; serve it after. Candle lighting is the fixed minute. Bread is patient once it is out of the oven.
